Enforcement updates

South Korea's data watchdog issues fine on broadcasting company

The Personal Information Protection Commission has issued a fine on LG HelloVision Co., Ltd. for violations under the Act on Promotion of Information and Communications Network Utilization and Information Protection 2001. It was held that the company had failed to implement appropriate safeguards, such as access logs and controls, encryption and had processed resident registration numbers without a valid legal basis. The company was thus fined KRW 11 million along with a corrective order.

Swedish Authority launches investigation after data Security breach on Kry International AB

The authority has announced an investigation into Kry International AB regarding a data security breach relating to the transfer of personal data to Facebook. The complaint states that the company had a Facebook pixel on two of its websites, which has led to the company transferring personal data to Facebook. The company is now required to report to the authority on their privacy measures such as types of personal data transferred, how many people may have been affected by the incident, and what technical and organisational security measures the company has taken.

Telecom providers ordered to delete stored data in Portugal

The Portuguese data protection authority has ordered all electronic communications providers to delete data stored after a ruling that declared some of the provisions to be unconstitutional. The Constitutional Court held that the limits of proportionality are crossed, in the restriction of fundamental rights to the reservation of privacy of private life and to informative self-determination and the aggression of those fundamental rights are not counterweighed by the positive effects on the fight against crime.
